

PREPARED FOR YE YING

Ye Ying's Tree of Life Reading

Seeing the blind spots between your insight and your choices

The Tree of Life · 3 cards first seen in the email · 7 cards drawn for this reading

Ye Ying, this Tree of Life spread looks straight at a subtle pattern: you think deeply, care a lot, and hold yourself to a high standard. The cards map out where that strength quietly turns into over-carrying, over-waiting, and staying inside your own impressions longer than you realize. This reading is a set of specific patterns to test in real situations, not a verdict on who you are.

Life Path 7 · The Seeker

You tend to develop through inquiry, reflection, and testing what is true. Your strongest expression turns depth into usable understanding while remaining connected to evidence and other people.

Strengths

- Analytical
- Reflective
- Discerning
- Independent-minded

Growth edges

- Withdrawal
- Overanalysis
- Distrust without enough evidence

How it shapes this reading: Your Life Path is 7, The Seeker. You naturally question, research, and look beneath the surface. You're strong at spotting patterns, weighing evidence, and trying to understand what's really true instead of just going along with how things appear. You tend to take ideas, responsibilities, and your own integrity seriously. The challenge side is that this depth can pull you inward. You may withdraw to think instead of talking things through, keep testing things in your mind long after there's enough information for a small step, or doubt people's words and systems more than you intend to show. You can end up trusting your private interpretations more than what you could learn from a simple clarifying question or shared check. In this spread about blind spots, your Seeker qualities show up in very concrete ways: - When things feel unclear, you are more likely to stay in reflection or quiet effort than to risk a direct question or a half-formed decision. - You can shoulder extra work because you want things done properly and safely, but not always say out loud where the limits are. - You may present as calm and competent, so others don't realize you are still unsure, tired, or hungry for honest feedback. The cards don't ask you to stop being a Seeker. They ask how you can keep your depth and also: - move sooner into modest experiments, - show more of what you actually need from others, - and test your inner stories against real conversations rather than carrying them alone.

YOUR COMPLETE SPREAD

1 The Moon
how a blind spot affects you

2 Two of Swords
what you already understand

3 Three of Pentacles
what you have concluded

4 Seven of Pentacles
what you keep excusing

5 Ace of Wands
what you feel you are owed

6 King of Wands
what's left of the love

7 The Hierophant
what you want to win

8 Queen of Wands
what you show people

9 Knight of Cups
what home feels like

10 The Hanged Man
what it costs in money

The Lovers · Your Lovers card: how your Seeker nature makes choices and commitments

The Lovers as your personal card says your Seeker path is shaped by what you consciously choose and what you're willing to share or commit to.

You don't just want to understand in private; you want your choices, work, and relationships to line up with your real values. You're drawn to situations where decisions matter—where picking one direction, standard, or agreement changes how people are treated.

As a Seeker, you might hesitate to choose until you've thought everything through. As a Lovers person, you're also keenly aware that your choices affect others. Put together, a core blind spot can be:

- delaying conversations or decisions because you care so much about getting them right for everyone,

- and then quietly taking on more responsibility or doing more behind the scenes to protect people from confusion or disappointment.

In this spread, The Lovers sits in the background of several cards:

- The Hierophant (position 7) shows your drive to hold clear standards “for everyone’s sake.”
- The Wands court cards (King and Queen of Wands in positions 6 and 8) show how you can look strong and decisive, even when you're carrying more than was ever clearly agreed.

Your blind spot isn't that you don't care. It's almost the opposite: you care so much that you may choose quiet effort and private analysis over shared, imperfect decisions and visible limits. The reading will keep bringing you back to one question: “What am I actually choosing here, and who else could I bring into that choice sooner?”

1. The Moon — how a blind spot affects you

The Moon · how a blind spot affects you

In the Rider–Waite Moon, a pale moon hangs in a misty sky. A dog and a wolf howl up at it between two towers, while a small crayfish just begins to crawl out of the water at the bottom of the card.

This picture fits one of your main blind spots: when things feel unclear, your attention can get pulled far away into distant possibilities and inner theories, while the small, nearby signal is easy to miss.

You already saw that The Moon can mean getting caught in possible explanations while a first reaction or contradiction close at hand goes unexamined. Read against the full spread and your Seeker path, the twist is this:

- As a thoughtful, analytical person, you're inclined to trust your private impressions—especially if you already half-doubt what others say or how systems work.

- When something feels “off,” you're likely to build an internal story about what's going on instead of checking a simple fact or asking a direct question.

In this position (“how a blind spot affects you”), The Moon says:

- A feeling of unease or confusion pushes you deeper into your own head.
- You may spend a lot of time refining inner explanations instead of turning toward the small, practical check right in front of you—like noticing a concrete behavior, asking, “What did you mean by that?”, or re-reading an actual agreement.

This links directly to the Two of Swords in position 2: once you've started feeding those inner stories, staying in a poised, waiting stance can feel safer than reaching for new input. Over time, this Moon pattern can leave you surrounded by half-tested theories while the simplest evidence—an email, a bill, a direct conversation—is still waiting quietly at the bottom of the card, like that crayfish by the water's edge.

Your Seeker strength is your ability to analyze. The Moon shows the blind spot: giving more weight to your own un-checked impressions than they've actually earned.

Check this against your life: Next time something feels “off” or confusing, pause and ask: “What am I assuming here that I haven't actually checked with anyone?” Then test one of those assumptions with a simple, factual question to another person or to the source (a message, contract, or bill). Notice how your view changes—or doesn't—once you have that extra piece of reality.

What this asks of you: When this blind spot is active, you can spend a lot of time turning private theories over in your mind, while small, practical checks that would clarify the situation are left undone. This can keep you in uncertainty longer than necessary and make it harder for others to correct misunderstandings.

2. Two of Swords — what you already understand

Two of Swords · what you already understand

In the Two of Swords, a blindfolded figure sits on a stone bench. Their arms are crossed, holding two heavy swords in perfect balance. Behind them is a still sea and a crescent moon.

You already sense this part of yourself. You know you can get stuck in that poised, frozen place:

- fully aware of two sides of a decision,
- holding them both carefully in your mind,
- but not putting either sword down long enough to reach for anything new.

You've seen that understanding the case for two options can make waiting feel controlled. With the rest of the spread, this card sharpens what you already know:

- You're often very good at weighing pros and cons and anticipating outcomes.
- Especially when you feel responsible for others' wellbeing, you may keep refining the same mental comparison, telling yourself you're being careful.

- But in practice, nothing changes in the outside world. No trial step is taken, no time limit is set, no question is asked.

Compared to The Moon in position 1, which shows you feeding inner impressions, the Two of Swords shows the stance you recognize: "I'll just think about it a bit more." It's not cluelessness. It's a kind of self-aware over-caution.

The blindfold is key. When you're here, you usually know you're still debating. What you might underestimate is the cost of staying in this pose:

- New information rarely arrives on its own.
- Opportunities don't wait while you re-run the same arguments.

You understand that you can overthink. This card confirms that the blind spot isn't whether you see the pattern—it's how often you let that familiar balancing act replace a simple, time-limited experiment in real life.

Check this against your life: Think of one decision from the last few months where you compared options for a long time. Ask yourself: "Did I actually change what I did based on new information, or did I mostly revisit the same list in my head without setting a clear decision date or trying a small experiment?"

What this asks of you: You already know you tend to keep decisions in your head longer than necessary, especially when others might be affected. The risk is that this controlled waiting can quietly become a habit, so choices are postponed instead of being tested through small, real-world steps.

3. Three of Pentacles — what you have concluded

Three of Pentacles · what you have concluded

In the Three of Pentacles, a skilled worker stands on a bench, carving stone. Two other figures—one in a robe, one in a hood—hold up a drawing or plan and appear to be discussing the work with them. The vaulted ceiling suggests a shared project that matters.

You’ve already drawn some important conclusions about work, collaboration, and feedback:

- You value solid plans and visible skill. You like things to be thought through and well-made.
- You probably lean toward doing your thinking first and then bringing something fairly complete to others.

Earlier, we explored this as: a sensible conclusion may still need to be challenged by someone with different information or blunt feedback. With the full spread, this card adds another layer to your blind spot:

- You may have concluded, quite reasonably, that it’s “best” or “safest” if you work things out yourself before involving others.

- That can mean you present solutions as mostly finished, with less obvious space for people to question or shape them.

When this happens:

- Others may assume you don’t really want their input, because your ideas arrive already packed and polished.
- They may hold back thoughts or concerns that would have helped you.
- You end up relying more on your own conclusions (the Seeker in you) and less on shared perspective.

Linked back to the Two of Swords, once you finally move from inner weighing into action, you may act from a self-contained plan. And connected to The Moon, if others rarely challenge or add to your plans, it can quietly reinforce the sense that your inner reading of a situation is the most reliable one available.

The blind spot here is subtle: it isn’t that you dislike collaboration, but that your style of being competent and prepared can unintentionally close the door on the very feedback and help that would round out your understanding.

Check this against your life: In your next shared decision or project, notice how you bring your ideas. Do you say, “Here’s what I’ve decided,” or do you say, “Here’s my rough thinking—what do you see that I might be missing?” Then pay attention to whether people actually offer changes when you invite them clearly.

What this asks of you: You tend to rely on your own thinking first and may share your ideas when they already feel finished. This can discourage others from challenging your conclusions or offering support, leaving you with more responsibility and fewer outside checks than you might prefer.

4. Seven of Pentacles — what you keep excusing

Seven of Pentacles · what you keep excusing

SEVEN OF PENTACLES

In the Seven of Pentacles, a person leans on a long tool, gazing at a bush that bears golden coins like fruit. Their posture is weary and thoughtful, as if asking, “Is this worth it?”

This card in the position of “what you keep excusing” points straight at effort and responsibility.

The scene shows:

- long, steady work already invested,
- a pause to assess the results,
- and a tendency to keep standing there waiting, hoping the harvest will finally justify all the labor.

For you, this suggests a common blind spot:

- You may quietly take on more than was originally agreed—more tasks, more emotional labor, more keeping-track.
- You tell yourself it’s temporary, or that you just need to be patient a bit longer.
- Because you are conscientious, you may frame it as “doing what needs to be done” rather than noticing that the load has become lopsided.

This is where Seeker depth and Lovers responsibility blend: you see what could go wrong if someone drops the ball, so you lean in and hold more. The Seven of Pentacles shows the moment where fatigue starts, but the story in your head still says:

- “I’ve already put so much in, I can’t stop now.”
- “It’ll pay off soon, I just need to keep going.”

Connected back to the Three of Pentacles, if you haven’t clearly invited others into the planning, it’s even more likely that you’ll end up doing more of the work for longer. And The Moon hints that others may not see how tired you are, because much of this justifying happens silently inside you.

The blind spot is not that you work hard; it’s that you normalize a level of effort or responsibility that isn’t actually sustainable, and call it “necessary” when in fact it might be negotiable.

Check this against your life: Pick one area of your life where you feel low-key worn out—at work, in family roles, or in a community setting. Ask yourself: “What was the original agreement about what I would do here? Have I added things on my own without re-checking with anyone?”

What this asks of you: You tend to excuse or rationalize doing more than your share by telling yourself that it’s temporary or simply required. Over time this can lead to quiet resentment or exhaustion, while others may not even realize how much you’re holding.

5. Ace of Wands — what you feel you are owed

Ace of Wands · what you feel you are owed

ACE OF WANDS

In the Ace of Wands, a hand emerges from a cloud, holding a single wooden wand that is sprouting fresh green leaves. In the background, a landscape stretches out with hills and a distant castle. The whole card feels like a spark—the beginning of energy, initiative, and inspiration.

In the position of “what you feel you are owed,” this card speaks to your inner sense of fairness around effort and enthusiasm.

When you bring:

- a clear idea,
- strong initiative,
- and genuine care to something,

there’s a natural, often unspoken expectation: that the world—or other people—will respond with matching energy and respect.

Your Seeker nature wants things done thoughtfully. Your Lovers card adds that you want commitments to feel mutual. The Ace of Wands shows the seed of a belief like:

- “If I step up with high-quality effort and intention, others should rise to meet that.”

This becomes a blind spot when standards creep upward:

- If other people’s “good enough” efforts don’t match your intensity, their help may never feel fully acceptable.
- You may quietly feel that you’re owed a certain level of appreciation, precision, or passion—anything less feels like being let down.

Linked to the Seven of Pentacles, this inner sense of being owed matching energy can subtly justify over-carrying:

- If you feel others’ efforts fall short of what’s “proper,” it’s easier to think, “I’ll just keep doing it myself until it’s done right.”

The risk is that realistic, adequate contributions from others are dismissed because they don’t match the original spark you brought. That keeps you in the role of the primary driver, even when you’re tired or would prefer to share the load.

This card doesn’t say your standards are wrong. It asks whether your expectations of matching intensity make it harder for you to accept support that’s imperfect but still genuinely helpful.

Check this against your life: Notice the next time someone offers to help or takes over a task you care about. Do you feel an urge to correct, refine, or redo their work because it doesn’t match how you would have done it—even if the outcome is basically fine?

What this asks of you: You often feel that when you bring strong initiative and care, you should receive responses that match that level. When those responses fall short of your inner standard, you may struggle to accept “good enough” help, which keeps you doing more yourself.

6. King of Wands — what's left of the love

King of Wands · what's left of the love

KING OF WANDS

In the King of Wands, a figure sits on a throne decorated with salamanders and lions. They hold a flowering wand upright and look ahead with steady intensity. The landscape is warm and dry, suggesting heat, drive, and focus.

In “what’s left of the love,” this card describes what remains of your motivation and care after your blind spots have been at work for a while.

Here’s the pattern the King points to:

- Even when you’re tired or under-acknowledged, your vision doesn’t disappear. You still care about the outcome.
- But your care hardens into control. Instead of shared effort, it becomes, “I’ll steer this myself.”

After:

- The Moon’s inner theories,
 - the Two of Swords’ long weighing,
 - the Three of Pentacles’ self-contained planning,
 - the Seven of Pentacles’ over-carrying,
 - and the Ace of Wands’ high standards,
- what’s left is a strong, self-directed will.

You may think:

- “If no one else will hold this properly, I’ll do it.”
- “I know the best direction; it’s simpler if I just decide.”

From the outside, that can look like firm, decisive leadership. But as a blind spot, it carries two costs:

- Others are less likely to offer honest input or help, because it seems like you already have a clear plan.
- You end up further reinforcing the earlier pattern: people step back, you do more, your sense of “having to be the strong one” grows.

This King isn’t saying you shouldn’t lead. It’s showing how your caring, when strained, can turn into a more controlled stance that closes the door a bit on the very collaboration and relief you might quietly want.

Check this against your life: In a situation where you feel others aren’t matching your effort, listen for thoughts like, “I’ll just decide this,” or “It’s easier if I do it.” When they arise, ask yourself: “Have I actually asked what they can realistically offer, or am I assuming and taking over?”

What this asks of you: When you feel overburdened or let down, your remaining care often turns into firm self-direction: you take the lead and set the direction yourself. This can unintentionally discourage others from contributing and leave you carrying more responsibility alone.

7. The Hierophant — what you want to win

The Hierophant · what you want to win

THE HIEROPHANT

The Hierophant shows a robed figure seated between two pillars, wearing a crown, holding a staff. Two followers kneel before them, and keys lie crossed at their feet. The scene suggests shared rules, teachings, and tradition.

In the position of “what you want to win,” this card gets to the heart of why you keep stepping in and holding so much.

Underneath your patterns of effort and analysis, you seem to want something like this:

- clear expectations,
- trustworthy standards,
- and the sense that someone reliable is making sure things are done properly so people are not hurt by confusion or carelessness.

The blind spot is not that you want order or clarity; it’s that you often volunteer yourself as the one who will guarantee it.

Combined with your Lovers card, this can sound like:

- “If I don’t hold the line on what’s right or careful, who will?”
- “If I step back, things might become sloppy, unfair, or unsafe.”

Linked with the Seven of Pentacles, this is the deeper payoff you’re chasing when you keep working and waiting: not just a completed task, but the comfort of knowing the “rules” were kept and people were protected.

The cost is that you may:

- assume responsibility that was never clearly given to you,
- feel you must uphold more than your fair share of order for everyone’s sake,
- and struggle to step back, even when you’re exhausted or when others could share the role.

This card suggests your inner victory isn’t winning praise or power; it’s winning the feeling that there is a solid, fair structure —often because you are quietly acting as its guardian.

Check this against your life: When you find yourself about to take charge or correct something, ask: “Have we actually agreed I’m the one in charge of this, or am I stepping in because I don’t trust others to keep the standard I believe is necessary?”

What this asks of you: You want the assurance that expectations are clear and that someone can be trusted to uphold them. Often, you quietly cast yourself in that role, which makes it harder to limit your responsibilities or let others carry their part of the structure.

8. Queen of Wands — what you show people

Queen of Wands · what you show people

In the Queen of Wands, a poised figure sits upright on a throne, holding a wand in one hand and a sunflower in the other. A small black cat sits at their feet. The Queen looks confident, warm, and ready to act.

In the “what you show people” position, this card describes the surface impression you tend to give when these blind spots are in play.

You likely present as:

- capable and energetic,
- warm but self-directed,
- someone who seems to “have it handled.”

This Queen is approachable, but not needy. People looking at this card might think:

- “They’re fine; they’re on top of things.”

Connected to the Three of Pentacles and the King of Wands, this forms a loop:

- You do a lot of internal work and planning.
- You carry extra responsibility to uphold standards.
- By the time others see you, you appear composed and in control.

The blind spot is that this capable surface can hide:

- how stretched you feel,
- how much input or reassurance you’d actually welcome,
- or how uncertain you might still be inside.

Because you look organized and resilient, others may:

- assume you don’t need help,
- hesitate to question your plans,
- or overlook the idea that you might be tired or unsure.

This isn’t about pretending; it may simply feel natural to meet the world with competence. The Queen of Wands just points out that the way you show up can accidentally block the very support and perspective that would ease your load and sharpen your understanding.

Check this against your life: Notice in the next week: do people around you seem surprised if you mention feeling overwhelmed or unsure? If so, that’s a sign that your usual way of presenting yourself leads them to assume you’re consistently fine without much support.

What this asks of you: On the outside, you tend to look confident, warm, and in control. This can lead others to believe you don’t need help or space to question your own plans, which reinforces your habit of carrying more and relying chiefly on your own judgment.

POSITION 9

9. Knight of Cups — what home feels like

Knight of Cups · what home feels like

KNIGHT OF CUPS

In the Knight of Cups, an armored figure rides a white horse, carefully holding a cup in front of them. The horse walks slowly; there is a river to cross and distant hills ahead. The scene feels gentle and deliberate.

In “what home feels like,” this card speaks to emotional safety and your natural way of handling feelings.

For you, “home” may feel like:

- having space to move through your inner landscape at your own pace,
- carrying your feelings carefully, not spilling them everywhere,
- and approaching emotional conversations only when you’re ready.

This fits your Seeker side: you process internally, you search for meaning, you don’t rush emotional truth. The Knight of Cups suggests that safety feels like being allowed a private journey and then returning with something to share.

The blind spot comes when others can’t see that inner journey:

- From the outside, your quiet processing may look like distance or withdrawal.
- If you don’t say, “I need a little time, but I will come back to this,” people close to you may be left guessing.

Linked with The Moon, your inner interpretations can deepen while you’re away, but others only see your silence. Connected to the Queen of Wands, there’s a contrast: publicly, you may look composed and capable; privately, home might be where you slow down and feel more tender, but not always out loud.

None of this is wrong. The Knight of Cups doesn’t say “stop processing internally.” It suggests your blind spot is around communicating how you withdraw and when you plan to reconnect, so that your need for space doesn’t get mistaken for indifference or permanent distance.

Check this against your life: Recall the last time you needed emotional space from someone close. Did you tell them clearly that you were taking some time and roughly when you’d be ready to talk again, or did you mostly go quiet until you felt settled?

What this asks of you: Emotional safety often means having room to process feelings privately and then re-approach in your own time. Without clear signals about this, others may experience your inward focus as unexplained distance, which can create misunderstandings around care and closeness.

10. The Hanged Man — what it costs in money

The Hanged Man · what it costs in money

THE HANGED MAN

The Hanged Man shows a figure hanging upside down by one foot from a wooden beam, a halo glowing around their head. Their expression is calm, almost serene, despite being suspended and unable to move.

In “what it costs in money,” this card brings the earlier themes down to earth: time, cash, and missed chances.

The Hanged Man is about:

- pausing to see things differently,
- staying in suspension rather than pushing forward,
- accepting stillness in exchange for insight.

For a Seeker, this is familiar. You value reflection. The blind spot is when that reflection stretches past the point where it’s useful.

In concrete terms, this might look like:

- delaying a decision about a purchase, investment, or job change until the best options have passed or become more expensive,
- waiting to renegotiate a workload or fee until you’re already drained, making it harder to ask for what’s fair,
- postponing key questions in negotiations because you want to gather more information, only to find the opportunity window has narrowed.

Connected back to the Two of Swords and The Moon, this card shows the price of extended inner weighing and private impressions: while you are thinking and hanging in place, time continues outside the frame. Offers expire, early-bird rates vanish, simple alternatives get locked out.

The Hanged Man doesn’t say “never pause.” It says: be aware of when your valuable ability to see from multiple angles becomes a habit of staying suspended past the point where a small, imperfect action would have protected your time, money, or options.

Your blind spot is not a tendency toward reckless spending or impulsive commitments. It’s almost the reverse: thoughtful waiting that quietly costs you opportunities you were actually ready enough to test.

Check this against your life: Think of one recent situation tied to money or a clear opportunity—a course, a job, a move, a negotiation, a trip. Did you delay deciding or asking a key question until some options were no longer available or more costly, even though you could have taken a small, reversible step earlier?

What this asks of you: Your preference for careful reflection can lead to waiting so long that some financial options close or become less favorable. The cost of your blind spots often shows up as missed chances, delayed decisions, or time and money spent maintaining a suspended situation instead of testing a modest next step.

How the reading comes together

Across the Tree of Life spread, a single pattern keeps repeating in different clothes.

- The Moon and The Hanged Man show how you can stay inside private impressions and suspended analysis, letting time and options slip by.
- The Two of Swords and Knight of Cups show how you handle uncertainty and emotion by turning inward and waiting until you feel ready, often without fully signaling to others what's happening.
- The Three of Pentacles, Seven of Pentacles, Ace of Wands, King of Wands, and Hierophant map how you take on more responsibility than was clearly agreed, guided by high standards and the wish to protect people with solid, reliable structure.
- The Queen of Wands shows the outside view: you look capable and in control, so people assume you don't need much help or room for doubt.

Put simply, your blind spots aren't about being careless. They cluster around:

- staying in your head and on your own for too long,
- over-carrying responsibility while under-sharing your limits, and
- appearing more self-sufficient than you actually wish to be.

As a 7 Life Path Seeker with The Lovers as your personal card, you care deeply that things are true, fair, and thoughtfully handled. The cards suggest that this very care, when unspoken or untested, can:

- keep you in reflection instead of action,
- keep you working instead of renegotiating,
- and keep you looking strong instead of asking for input or relief.

The reading doesn't ask you to abandon depth, standards, or responsibility. It invites you to:

- move a little sooner into small, testable steps when money or opportunities are on the line,
- talk earlier and more concretely about what you are carrying and what was actually agreed,
- and show a bit more of your uncertainty or need for space so others can meet you where you really are, not just where you look.

Each card offers a different doorway into the same shift: from private, extended holding to shared, time-bound action and clearer communication.

Your question was, "What are my blind spots?"

In this spread, your blind spots are not about leaping without looking. They're almost the opposite: staying in your head and on your own so long that decisions, responsibilities, and feelings remain half-shared.

The central tension is between:

- your Seeker need to understand and protect what's right (The Moon, Two of Swords, Hierophant),
- and your Lovers-style pull toward shared decisions and mutual standards, which can't fully work if too much happens privately (Three of Pentacles, Queen of Wands, Knight of Cups).

The ruled-out path is clear: it's unlikely that your main problem is reckless impulsivity or rushing into commitments. The cards consistently point to thoughtful delay, extra responsibility, and quiet processing instead.

Two concrete ways this can show up are:

- 1) Committing sooner to modest, testable actions and money decisions instead of waiting for full certainty. This means noticing when the Hanged Man and Two of Swords have done enough, and a small step—rather than a perfect plan—would protect your time or options.
- 2) Making more of your inner load and needs visible. That includes renegotiating responsibilities when the Seven of Pentacles tiredness appears, inviting input earlier like the Three of Pentacles suggests, and telling people when you need space and when you'll return, as in the Knight of Cups.

A single practical test can help you tell whether you're in a blind spot or in healthy reflection:

> Set a clear, external marker—either a date or a conversation—for one decision or responsibility that currently lives mostly in your head. On that date, either take a modest, reversible step (even if you're not fully certain) or openly renegotiate what you're carrying with at least one other person.

If doing this feels strangely difficult—even though no disaster will follow—that's a sign you've found one of these blind spots in action. If it brings relief or new information, you'll have proof that shifting from private holding to shared, concrete movement is the adjustment your cards are pointing toward.

Marcus